Switched over from Jekyll to Nikola yesterday.

One of the primary reasons was that I got fed up with managing a Ruby development environment across all my machines. In spite of my rantings, I'm sure Ruby and Ruby installers are fine - it's just something that I'd have to deal with on a recurring basis for one specific task - other than for Jekyll blogging, I don't use Ruby.

So while a platform based on Python - generally my go to language, made sense, the other driving force for the switch was the fact that Emacs and org-mode have become such major parts of my workflow and productivity.

What do I use org-mode for?

- lesson planning
- document preparation (instead of L^AT_EX)
